Management commentary

Equity markets were largely trendless and barely volatile in January. The European index Euro Stoxx 50 was down 1.7% whereas the US market reached new highs (S&P 500 +1.9%) and Japan is almost flat (Nikkei 225 -0.4%). The strong dispersion of sector performances led to very low realised volatility of major indices this start of the year (S&P 500 at 6.1%, Euro Stoxx 50 at 10.2% and 16.4% for the Nikkei 225 in January). In this context, implied volatilities were down for all indices and across the entire maturity range. The VSTOXX ends down 0.7 points at 17.4% despite the market being down, while the VIX, for the US, sheds over 2 points at 12%. The 1-year implied volatility of our global basket dropped 1.1 points (S&P 500 -1.2% ; Euro Stoxx 50 -1.1% ; Nikkei 225 -0.7% ; HSI -1.6% ; HSCEI -1.95%) and reached near a 2 year low at 17.1%. Medium term volatilities remained resilient at the end of last year, sustained by strong demand, which came from investors massively seeking upside exposure via call options and from hedging activity in connection to maturing structured products. The start of the year showed the flipside, with the retracement of volatility significantly hurting the portfolio. The directional engine contributed negatively (-1.83%) due to our average Vega exposure of 1.66 over the month. The second engine ("active management") did not allow to offset the costs of being long volatility and thus increased the loss over the month. Indeed, the downward move of volatility was fairly regular and did not provide opportunities for active trading. Furthermore, replication costs rose due to extremely low realised volatility (high cost of carry) and due to the steepening of the term structure throughout the 4th quarter of 2016, which led to costs of roll (i.e. cost of maintaining a 1-year average maturity) penalising again performance. We took advantage of the rising risk appetite to increase slightly our volatility exposure at attractive levels. At the end of January the Vega stands at 1.71 after reaching 1.76 during the month. The geographic allocation did not change much this month, with Asia overweight at the expense of the US (37% US ; 34% Europe ; 29% Asia). Within Asia, we increased the weight of China to 9%, with a higher exposure to the HSCEI than the HSI. Indeed the former reached very attractive volatility levels from a historic perspective. So far markets do not seem wary of upcoming events in both Europe and the US. Nevertheless some investors seize the current low volatility levels to protect their equity portfolios. Rising uncertainties surround in particular the implementation of Trump's economic programme and the outcome of upcoming elections in various European countries. This reinforces our belief that markets are currently too complacent and that turmoil lies ahead, potentially in the coming weeks.
