The fund's aims

The fund aims to achieve long-term capital growth by investing principally in the shares of companies listed, quoted or traded in the United States of America.

Fund update

December was an extremely tough month for markets. The S&P 500 index fell by 9% (in US dollar terms). Thanks mainly to our cautious industry allocation, the fund outperformed.

Themes that had been present in the market for a couple of months intensified during December. Optimism about a trade deal with China waned somewhat and investors continued to obsess over the direction of the Federal Reserve's monetary policy. The market clearly believes that, given weaker growth globally and the real-world impact of disruption to trade, the US economy does not need any more increases to interest rates now. It is also very sensitive to the fact that – for the first time in history – the Federal Reserve is raising interest rates and reducing its bloated balance sheet at the same time. There is no precedent to allow us to judge what impact this will have on economic growth.

When there are significant moves in the market as we had in December, stock-specific issues are much less important than the type of stocks you own. The fund benefited from being significantly underweight banks and overweight utilities and software.

Our view is that the boost provided by fiscal stimulus in 2018 has played out in the economy and that tighter interest-rate policy together with uncertainties over trade mean that economic growth has peaked. We do not think that the economy is within 12 months of entering a recession, which in some sectors is already being discounted. That being said, we will be paying close attention to what the Fed does over the next six months, with particular focus on the impact on borrowing costs within the economy. We noted that corporate borrowing became significantly more expensive during December and will be looking at the credit market to guide us on future economic risks.
