Management commentary

Asia ex-Japan equities had a strong month in March despite the failure of the US administration to repeal the Affordable Health Care Act, and investors questioning the Trump administration's ability to "come good" with the other more critical policy areas – like tax reform, deregulation, and infrastructure spending.

The resilience suggest that Asia's strong showing year-to-date, aside to the Trump reflation trade, has its roots also in the region's improving economic fundamentals – as alluded to by the rising EPS trends, higher ROEs, improving manufacturing activity, and stronger export performance. These improving data points, coupled with growth stability in China, will underpin the growth narrative in Asia ex-Japan this year, although the regional equity market is still susceptible to periods of intermittent volatility and pullback. We do see some stocks in this region running ahead of fundamentals, solely betting on certain reflationary themes. Nevertheless, the longer term outlook in Asia remains solid in our opinion.

Separately, oil prices gave back some of its recent upside in March, as the US shale oil producers are making a comeback following higher prices. This may in turn, put a cap on future energy price increases going forward.
