Manager commentary as at 31 Oct 2014

October was a difficult month for Asian equities with some extreme performances across markets. Hong Kong and China were among the best-performing major markets, while Korea was among the worst performers globally. Meanwhile, the Topix ended the month in between these extremes with a slight gain.

Oil prices and Japan were both in the spotlight in October: We were surprised when the oil price drifted towards USD 80 per barrel and subsequently went even lower. Investors, as included, all thought that there was ample marginal supply with costs around USD 80 (a Chinese oil company told us that the cost of its oil sands was around USD 100 per barrel), and that there should be support for crude around that level with some supply potentially going offline. However, we underestimated how long it would take producers to take such supply offline. Most Asian countries are net oil importers, so the softness in crude can help to offset the cost pressures from the strength of the US dollar.

Japan was also in the news: The yen fell sharply on the last day of October when the Bank of Japan launched a new easing programme. The announcement caught many short-term investors off-guard. For much of October, the short-sell ratio in the market has been over 30% of all sell orders, which is very high on a historical basis. Following the BoJ's announcement there has been a scramble to cover these positions. Aside from the volatility of the market, corporate fundamentals have remained sound and Japan continues to have the best positive earnings revisions of any major market. We are currently in the middle of earnings season and results have been encouraging. Aggregate corporate earnings estimates have remained favourable, with 75% of companies beating guidance.
