Economic situation and capital market in the reporting period/outlook

Marked recovery in global economy – emerging inflation concerns

As at the end of September 2021, the reporting year has seen strong recovery in the global economy. From the start of 2021 onwards, this progress was driven in particular by the easing of restrictions on movement following further progress with the COVID-19 vaccination programme. In the developed nations in particular, the recovery was supported by substantial government aid payouts to companies and citizens affected by the restrictions. There was a strong labour market bounceback in the US, but bottlenecks have recently begun to emerge. The disruption to supply chains in the wake of government measures to contain the COVID-19 pandemic have recently been causing problems with industrial production in Europe in particular. A sharp increase in the cost of key raw materials, further energy price hikes due to CO2 pricing and the general surge in demand have led to a marked acceleration in inflation rates and given rise to concerns that the increased inflation could set in for the long term. In many emerging markets, the more limited fiscal scope has meant that the economy has been slow to stabilise. Early normalisation in China also had a positive impact on global trade activity initially. Subsequently, however, the more stringent regulation of certain sectors of the Chinese economy began to counteract growth momentum and weigh on economic sentiment. The recovery of the services sector was generally muted across the board, as local restrictions on mobility and contact were still in place in many countries and international tourism only began to increase again gradually.

The central banks of the western economies stuck to their near-zero interest rate policy given the huge increase in public debt, and signalled their willingness to tolerate a temporary inflation increase. Against this backdrop, the European Central Bank increased its medium- to long-term inflation target to an average of 2%. In the US, meanwhile, the Federal Reserve has indicated that its economic stimulus measures will be phased out and a first base rate hike is being considered for 2022. China's central bank has already tightened its monetary policy to curb the growth of lending.

Equity markets: Primarily very high price increases

On the international stock exchanges, prices recovered from the slump of spring 2020. The strong rally was buoyed by a significant bounceback in the global economy, persistently low interest rates, and economic stimulus measures from the western central banks. Consumer optimism was confirmed in the form of corporate profits, which largely began to rise again.

Overall, the US equity market saw the biggest price gains. Certain European stock exchanges saw comparable increases, though the trend in the German market was noticeably weaker. Generally speaking, sectors that are particularly dependent on the economy tended to do better, although the upwards momentum in certain service-focused sectors was weaker. Performance in the emerging markets was extremely varied. Although the picture was positive overall, the very high price gains in Eastern Europe, for example, were in contrast to the moderate profits in China.

Volatility, i.e. the fluctuation range of price movements on the equity market, mostly declined because market participants were generally confident about the outlook for the economy and about corporate profit, despite some disruptive factors.

Bond markets: Government bonds under pressure; spread securities in demand

The performance of the individual segments within the global bond markets was extremely varied. The emerging inflation concerns and the discussion about the tightening of monetary policy in the United States created selling pressure, especially for long-term government bonds from the US and the eurozone.

High-quality corporate securities with an investment-grade rating, on the other hand, produced mostly positive results. As a result of increased demand, their interest rate premiums against government bonds with comparable credit standing and maturity structure declined. High-yield corporate bonds generally achieved clear price gains across the board. They profited from yield advantages and from the improved earnings situation of many issuers and, as a result, from the declining probability of defaults.

Overall, interest-bearing securities from emerging markets posted solid growth. Government securities denominated in leading international currencies such as the US dollar performed particularly well. There was less demand for emerging-market securities issued in local currencies because international investors were still sceptical about exchange rate trends in a number of economies.

Outlook

Equities

Corporate profits remain the key argument in favour of equity investments, with profits likely to be driven up by both revenue growth and increasing margins. Following strong price increases in the year to date, however, and with valuations looking less favourable in some instances, investors should be prepared for increased volatility on the stock markets given that the economic tailwind is likely to slow. In our opinion, this trend will unfold differently across regions and sectors. The future monetary policy of the leading central banks could see equity markets become increasingly susceptible to correction. It is possible, for example, that the US Federal Reserve could begin to scale back its bond purchases as early as November. In addition, market participants are also likely to be keeping a close eye on the rising energy prices, the effects of global supply chain bottlenecks and the unusual situation surrounding the Chinese real estate developer Evergrande.

Bonds

Inflation trends are likely to put the central banks under pressure. Although the majority of market participants currently expect the effects to be only temporary, unwelcome surprises in the form of a permanently higher price level cannot be ruled out. Overall, however, the process of tightening up monetary policy is likely to be slow and uneven. It is possible that the US Federal Reserve could begin to scale back its bond purchases as early as November. Purchases are likely to be phased out in the summer of next year, and interest rates could then begin to rise. Interest rate hikes by the European Central Bank, on the other hand, are likely to be a much more distant prospect – the ECB recently elected to make only a moderate cut in the rate of bond purchases. We believe that US yields could return to a flatter upwards curve in the medium term. Government bonds from the eurozone are set to avoid this trend, at least in part. As investors seek out returns, high-yield bonds should remain in demand, while investment-grade bonds are set to continue benefiting from large-scale purchases by the central banks. Due to ambitious valuations in some quarters, however, the segment remains subject to correction.
