Economic situation and capital market in the reporting period/outlook

World economy recovers from slump during coronavirus pandemic

The half-year under review to the end of March 2021 was shaped by a strengthening global economic recovery after previous government measures to contain the coronavirus pandemic resulted in a sharp economic downturn in many countries. An early return to “business as usual” in China was a key contributing factor for the positive developments in global trading activity, in particular on the manufacturing sector in export-oriented countries. The service sector, on the other hand, continued to suffer in many places as a result of local mobility and contact restrictions, along with the widespread stagnation of international tourism.

In the US, the rapid progress of coronavirus vaccination programmes, combined with an increased easing of restrictions since the beginning of the year, have led to a marked revival of the labour market. Economic and consumer sentiment have also improved as the result of additional support programmes from the new US government and the Federal Reserve’s ongoing generous monetary policy. The situation in the Asia-Pacific region also improved significantly, thanks in particular to the re-accelerated growth of the Chinese economy. Emerging countries in Latin America and Europe also saw a dynamic recovery, although there was considerable variation depending on the severity of the pandemic.

Central banks in Western economies maintained their near-zero interest policies in the face of an enormous increase in government debt and indicated their willingness to tolerate a cyclical increase in inflation. Conversely, in China there were signs of a general tightening of the refinancing environment in order to prevent excessive borrowing.

Stock markets: Overall strong increase in quotes

Most international stock exchanges saw a continuation of the price upturn that occurred following the slump in spring 2020. This can be attributed to a number of factors, including the expectation of a significant economic recovery, a persistently low interest rate environment and an increase in money supply by Western central banks. This optimism was generally confirmed by increasing company profits.

The US equity market and the European stock exchanges saw overall price gains on a similar scale (in euro); in some cases, striking differences were observed at sector level. Consumer cyclical sectors were primarily favoured, whilst price momentum remained fairly subdued in some service-oriented sectors. Banks, in particular, benefited from the possibility of future increases in market interest rates, whilst the previously dominant upward trend in large technology stocks weakened. In the emerging markets, results continued to be fairly mixed, although here, too, the overall picture indicated an impressive price recovery; in fact, this was slightly stronger than that of developed countries.

Volatility – i.e. the range of price fluctuations on the equity market – declined overall, although there were repeated phases of renewed nervousness on the stock markets. Despite some uncertainties and latent risks, the outlook for the economy and corporate profitability was ultimately assessed positively.

Bond markets: Partially opposing trends

Developments on the global bond markets once again varied greatly depending on region and risk class.

In most developed countries, there were no pronounced movements on the money market or for top-rated short-term securities. There, the ongoing interest rate remained close to zero as a result of extremely low or, in some cases, negative key interest rates of the central banks.

At the beginning of the period under review, longer-term government bonds from the USA and the eurozone still had extraordinarily low interest rates, as the further relaxation of monetary policy by the central banks and increased demand for very safe securities drove down yields and kept them low. In light of emerging economic optimism and expectations of higher inflation in future, the interest rate again increased for top-rated government bonds; this was reflected in price declines for securities in circulation. Consequently, results in this market segment were mostly negative.

By contrast, investment-grade high-quality corporate bonds experienced a slight upwards trend. Interest rate premiums declined for these bonds as a result of increased demand from return-seeking investors, meaning that, on balance, they still usually yielded a small positive return. Transnational high-yield corporate bonds performed significantly better, benefiting not only from noticeably higher returns, but also from the prospect of limited defaults in most sectors in light of the rapidly improving earnings outlook.

In general, interest-bearing securities from emerging markets achieved only moderate growth. Their risk premiums had already fallen to such an extent that many market participants now saw less potential in this environment, or favoured equities in the emerging economies.

Outlook

Equities

As spring begins, there are signs of a noticeable acceleration in economic momentum. Several factors point to strong growth rates: Falling infections thanks to the steady progress of vaccination (albeit at varying rates), milder temperatures in the Northern Hemisphere and the gradual easing of pandemic-related restrictions, coupled with ongoing supportive economic policies. This is especially true in the US, where Joe Biden has announced huge economic stimulus packages and significant progress has been made with vaccination. In China, on the other hand, sentiment indicators are signalling a slowdown in economic recovery, whilst in Europe, high rates of new infections and sluggish vaccination progress are dampening the outlook. The cyclical tailwind should in itself have a positive effect on corporate profits and, consequently, on equity markets. Particularly after the strong price increases seen in the past months, the profit development of companies is key in determining the pace of the stock markets. Current risks consist primarily of rising inflation risks, which could prompt the leading international central banks to change their monetary policies.

Bonds

Rising inflation risks could prompt the leading international central banks to change their extremely relaxed monetary policies. This is especially true for the US, where very high growth rates can be expected, not least as a result of the huge economic stimulus packages that have been announced. As a result, nascent discussions in relation to the end of the Fed's bond purchase programme are likely to continue to weigh on the bond market over the coming months. In our view, however, it is mainly temporary extraordinary factors that point to a noticeable uptick in inflation rates. These include significant base effects (compared with the economic slump in the previous year), rising commodity prices and noticeable catch-up effects in private consumption. The Fed expects its preferred inflation measure to decline again in 2022 and has indicated that interest rates will not increase before 2023. In the eurozone, inflation is likely to remain well below the European Central Bank's target rate again next year. In our view, a rapid turnaround in monetary policy is not yet on the horizon. For riskier bonds, a moderate rise in returns as a result of economic growth can generally be considered positive. However, this does not apply to unexpectedly rapid and sharp interest rate increases.
