FUND COMMENTARY

2022's first quarter was tough as the supply shocks of Omicron and the conflict in Ukraine focused some market participants' attention on inflation beneficiary sectors. Since May share prices have again rewarded profit growth, which we see as the fundamental premise of our approach. The yen weakened significantly in the summer, popularly explained by the sovereign yield gap with the US. The yen then strengthened significantly towards year-end as the Bank of Japan adjusted its Yield Curve Control policy. Most of our companies provisioned for this and their currency damage was meagre, although the perception of Japan was probably not helped by its volatile currency.

We believe that Japan remains one of the most exciting combinations of excellent global companies and attractive valuation, owing to the lack of research on these firms. Therefore, through it all we seek and stick with companies which have proved their survival skills and, which have been here before in terms of inflation, recession, war, currency volatility, or for that matter intellectual property threats, earthquakes and supply problems. Japan has many of these companies if you know where to look.

For 2023, we expect the high-teens average profit growth of our invested companies to outpace the broader market, which decades of historical precedent suggests will also be reflected in share prices.

We met, along with Comgest's Global team, approximately forty companies in December, mostly those whose shares we hold and ones which are tangential to them. We were impressed by the resilience of demand for unique products, for example at Daikin and Hamamatsu Photonics, by the post-Covid normalisation evident at Kosé, Food & Life Companies (which operates the Sushiro chain) and Oriental Land (Disneyland) and by hints of inflection in technology demand at Hoya and Lasertec.

We believe Japan remains a rich hunting ground for growth investors. Asia, whose consumers our companies service through aspirational brands, and whose industries they advance through semiconductor and automation technology, remains a large indirect exposure for us. Meanwhile, the reopening after Covid-19 has benefitted our portfolio holdings which are dependent on physical traffic. Changing Japan, in workforce structure and business practices, also remains a further source of ideas. Below is a sample of recent growth dynamics from meetings with our invested companies.

We spoke with the CEO of Kosé who confirmed the strength of the company's high-end brands and the potential of other Asian consumer markets, albeit locally or through inbound tourist consumption.

We joined a call with Hoya's CEO, who made clear his determination to avoid red ink in the company's disc substrate business despite a sharp demand adjustment, and the prospects for photoblanks used in semiconductor miniaturisation.

We spoke with the CEO of Murata Manufacturing, who explained the company's broadening portfolio of unique and competitive products, as the group gradually wins an even larger share of the cost of goods in the smartphone and other addressable markets.

We were also able to speak with the management of Sony, whose focus on its three profitable pillars (sensors, media and games) is increasingly clear, and whose improved monetisation of its games platform is supporting long-term profit growth.

We joined a small meeting with the Director of Orix who explained its increasing female director ratio and the social role of the company in nurturing successor-less small businesses through its own direct investments and through the company's subsidiary Robeco. What is more, Orix's renewable business remains one of the largest in Japan.

Our work with Shin-Etsu Chemical allowed us to confirm that it is signing long-term contracts for semiconductor wafer supply, which reflects the multi-year tightness of the industry.

During the year, we purchased Dexerials for its proven growth and its excellent technology whose uniqueness is attested by its peer-beating margins. We infer from the valuation that the market has not yet understood the story.

We acquired Toray Industries due to its carbon fibre dominance and the opportunities with both Boeing 787 and wind turbines.

We initiated a position in cup noodle maker Nissin Foods which exhibits growth potential in the US and China.

We also invested in NTT Data to capture the growing digital needs of especially the Japanese state, from which the company benefits disproportionately because of its large share in supplying pension and social welfare systems.

Hikari Tsushin, Yamaha and Chugai Pharmaceutical were sold as their growth disappointed us.

Japan reopened its borders only towards the end of the year, and not only could consumers enter and satisfy pent-up demand, but also investors. Many of our companies have told us about suddenly busy physical meeting schedules with foreign investors. Over time this should change the character of the incremental buyer, from foreigners with simple programme trades replicating US market patterns to investors looking for serious engagement.

At the same time, the easy growth comparisons for cyclical companies and the quick trade in bank stocks in line with global yields have become less obvious. Since May your portfolio's performance has stabilised as investors are again valuing sustainable growth. We expect this pattern to continue as our companies' earnings prove more sustainable than the market in general.

Active investment in Japanese equity has beaten the world for many years, surpassing most major global indices – for the obvious reason that Japan has globally leading companies which are undervalued because they are misunderstood, and that there is a constant incremental buyer in the domestic investor who will close that valuation gap.
